After his retirement from the Bench, Judge Campbell has had an active commercial and public law trial practice, concentrating on ADR and mediation and commercial litigation.

Hon. James H. Gilbert (ret.), Gilbert Mediation Center, Ltd., Eden Prairie, Minnesota, United States. He practices in business and civil litigation as counsel, consultant, arbitrator, mediator, (local) co-counsel, and strategist, specializing on mediation and arbitration. Judge Gilbert was an Associate Justice of the Minnesota Supreme Court from 1998-2004 and received over 5000 petitions for review, participated in over 800 decisions and authored numerous opinions and concurrences. He was appointed acting Chief Justice by the Minnesota Supreme Court in 2008 to hear a contested election case.

Consisting of two retired Judges, an in-house counsel, an international dispute resolution trainer and outside counsel in private practice, all with substantial experience in mediating and engaging in settlement discussions with parties from different parts of the world, this panel will share its knowledge on both ethical and cross-cultural issues arising in the international field during mediation and settlement negotiations.

Ethical considerations may come up regarding the different legal frameworks and practices in dealing with confidentiality, privileges and experiences. The mediator or negotiator must always comply with the rules of ethical conduct. Is an establishment of new rules necessary or should current rules be reviewed or amended? Or should there only be fewer formal standards and tools to have more flexibility, especially for cases where different ethical standards clash together?

Cross-cultural issues are sometimes obvious (common law – civil law / confrontational approach – reserved conduct etc.) but are often less predictable. With panel members from three continents being able to give examples from handling matters as judges, in-house counsel, mediators and party representatives, there will be a vivid discussion among the panellists and the audience.

A comparison of different legal systems shows that mediation and settlement negotiation come in different shapes and forms. Mandatory mediation is typical for common law jurisdictions. Some states currently discuss the introduction of new models of mediation limiting the voluntary nature which could provide for an “opt-out” option, cost sanctions or other regulatory solutions.

Another issue is the role of mediators and negotiators. Dispute resolution ‘common law style’ (disclosure, cross-examination, witness statements etc.) may delay the proceedings and increase the costs. Dispute resolution ‘civil law style’, on the other hand, is based rather on the parties gaining new perspectives through the mediator as a facilitator. Furthermore, many mediators around the world work with caucuses, where a separate confidential pre-discussion takes place with the parties separately, and where all parties and the mediator then come together for a final meeting.

How should these issues be dealt with, especially when two parties from different legal systems and/or different cultural backgrounds have a dispute? All cross-cultural mediations and negotiations have in common that there needs to be general awareness of the cultural background of both parties and of the negotiation methods in their home countries. Since globalization increases the number of global multi-jurisdictional disputes, cross-cultural issues are more important than ever.

Some level of global synchronization could facilitate mediation and settlement negotiation for cases of a larger and more international scale. The key is to respect the cultural and constitutional contexts of different jurisdictions.

The format of the panel will, due to the very practical significance, refrain from (academic) presentations, but focus on sharing, suggesting and defending certain approaches in dealing with parties from different cultural backgrounds. Despite the vast experience of all panel members, we are looking forward to learning from the audience and enter a vivid discussion.
